Message or signal

The information shared between sender and receiver. For good communication, the central idea of the message must be clear. Thus, the teacher must decide what to communicate keeping in mind the context and how the receiver (students) will interpret the message.

Medium/Channel

The sensory route through which encoder will communicate his message to the decoder. The medium can be print, electronic, or sound. The choice of medium may be dependent on contextual factors, relationship between the sender.

Receiver /Decoder

The person to whom the message is being sent. Receiver (student) may be a listener or a reader depending on the choice of medium by sender (teacher) to transmit the instructional contents.

Feedback

The response or reaction of the receiver to a message. Communication is effective only when it receives some feedback as it completes the loop of communication.

8.3 METHODS OF COMMUNICATION

1. Verbal Communication

Verbal communication is one way for people to communicate face-to-face. Some of the key components of verbal communication are sound, words, speaking and language.

2. Written communication

Written communication means communication by means of written symbols.
