and make a genuine attempt to learn about the company's business operations prior to the interview.

Access their official brand page on social media to find out basic company information and latest updates. This will show the interviewer that you take the interview seriously.

Ask how you can succeed in the job: For interviewers, the best thing during a face-to-face interview is to hear interesting questions from the candidates. Do your research well. Talk to employees in the company about the particular role on offer ensuring that you have meaningful queries at the end of the interview session. This will prove that you are keenly interested in knowing the company better.

Don'ts

Go overboard: Hiring managers are looking for passionate employees who are willing to dedicate themselves to a particular role. They are not interested in someone who desperately wants to land the job. Answer questions succinctly and do not exaggerate or deviate. Avoid extreme openness and flexibility to adapt or else the interviewer might see you as an over anxious or incompetent candidate.

Make personal comments: Avoid praising the interviewer's physical appearance, referring to other known employees (unless specifically asked for), asking personal questions, gossiping, and making sensational or sexist comments. These are likely to be viewed as highly irrelevant talk in a job interview and thus may lead to you being judged as unprofessional and rejected.

Be judgmental: Refrain from making caustic or evaluative statements about people, processes, or technology in the companies that you have interned with or had worked at. Do not reveal your biases to the interviewer.

Badmouth: Do not ever badmouth your last boss or someone else in your internship or past companies. It is unethical and will send a negative signal that you may be difficult to manage.

Being invited to a face-to-face personal interview is in itself a success, but it might be only the first step of a long hiring process. The main objective of attending an interview is to send signals of assurance to your future employer that you are the right talent they have been looking for.

Ensure that your CV does not lie and avoid exaggerating experiences. Demonstrate that you have the right balance of skills, attitude, and knowledge required for the job.

Good luck with your job interview!
